

Dr Margaret Fletcher

Margaret has worked as an educator for over forty years and, after retiring from Griffith University, has continued her work researching, publishing and consulting in organisational leadership, adult learning and education, with a recent interest on neuroscience.

Her research and publications have focussed on best practice in teaching, learning and change facilitation with an emphasis on using action research methods to explore innovative and transformative solutions to tricky and complex problems.

She has worked with institutions and non-government organisations to manage change by developing a culture of lifelong learning through critical reflection.

Her international work in South Africa, Sri Lanka and the South Pacific for AusAID has led to her accepting a position on the board of the charity HEDS (Health Education Development Solutions), working to improve primary health care and education in the Solomon Islands. Her work focuses on helping people find time, tools, resources and energy to achieve their goals—both personally and professionally.
